This course reading...

- A compelling look at how multiracial Latinx students shape identity in monoracial spaces.
- Reveals the hidden struggles of belonging, microaggressions, and identity formation.
- Based on real student experiences, offering fresh insights into Latinx and multiracial identity.
- Ideal for scholars and students in Latinx Studies, sociology, education, and race studies.

How do multiracial Latinx students navigate their identities and find belonging in a world that sees race monoracially?

Multiracial Latinx College Students: Navigating Sense of Place in Monoracial Contexts by Sylvia Martinez and Aaron C. Toland explores how multiracial identities are still viewed through a monoracial lens, causing social challenges. Many face microaggressions and struggle with belonging. Existing research mainly focuses on Black/White biracial identities, leaving multiracial Latinx experiences misunderstood. Through qualitative interviews, this book highlights how multiracial Latinx students navigate identity and belonging from home to K-12 schools and into predominantly white colleges.

Ideal for scholars and students in Latinx Studies, sociology, education, and race studies, as well as educators and policymakers seeking to understand multiracial identity in academic and social contexts.

Sylvia Martinez, a professor at Indiana University, researches Latinx education, identity, and race/ethnicity.

Aaron C. Toland is the second author of this book and a former student at Indiana University.
