This course reading...

- Explores the spectrum of violence against Latina and Latinx women and femme people
- Draws from research and lived experience to personalise the connection between researcher and researched
- Considers a range of case studies from various Latin American countries, including Argentina, Mexico and Brazil

What do the lived experiences of women in the Latin America tell us about resisting gender violence?

In this reflective account, researcher Joana Perrone explores the issue of feminicide in Latin America, from the cases of murdered and missing women in Ciudad Juarez, to the contemporary issues arising from the coronavirus pandemic. By engaging the stories of collective subjects in this struggle, the book examines the different ways in which violence intersects the lives of women and gender nonconforming people in Latin America, and how they have organised and resisted such violence.

Vital reading for students of gender studies, women's and womanist studies, Latinx and Latin American studies, and sociology/anthropology, Embodied Struggles brings into focus the connections and obligations between researcher and researched; in this case, a Latinx femme academic and the gendered communities of struggle who are confronting feminicide and other informalized forms of violence in Latin America.

Joana Perrone is a PhD candidate at the University of Oxford. They have a BA in International Relations from the University of Sussex and a MSt in Women's Studies from Oxford. Besides doing their PhD, Joana works in several education initiatives and writes for a variety of media outlets.
