This course reading...

- Explores how lived experiences at an educational institution can shape, form, and transform the perception of self and others.
- Features interviews with different generations of Romanian former students of Tsinghua University in China.
- Assesses the impact of intellectual, political, and economic interests within Romania's post-Socialist era, and how these influenced the exchanges of students with China.
- Is ideal reading for students of Asian Studies, Romanian and Eastern European Studies, Education Studies, and Sociology, as well as university policy makers.

How has the experience of studying at Beijing's Tsinghua University shaped the way five generations of Romanian students have seen themselves and others?

- Through interviews and conversations with Anna Eva Budura, Ștefan Cozma, Gabriel Zlămpăreț, Monica Bataragă, Roxana Moroșanu, and Andreea Diana Manolache, author Radu Sava addresses questions such as: How did China studies come into being and take shape in Romania during the Cold War era?
- What roles have higher education and Romanian agency played in Sino-Romanian relations since 1950?
- What did Romania expect of the People's Republic of China (PRC) at the time and in the new contexts of the post-Socialist era? A fascinating analysis of experience and impact over time, this book is ideal reading for students of Cold War Studies, Asian Studies, Romanian and Eastern European Studies, Education Studies, and Sociology, as well as university policy makers.

Radu Sava is a PhD candidate at the University of Bucharest in Romania.
